Redemption's Hope

"If we hope for what we do not yet have, we wait for it patiently." Romans 8:25

Hope seems so abstract. The English language is partly at fault for that. We use "hope" casually, from dreams about our future to long-shots on our Christmas lists. We hope for rain or sunshine, for a raise, for good health, for good luck, or for anything on which our heart can set its fickle desires. But biblical hope is not so abstract. Biblical hope expresses future certainty. In the Bible, hope is placed in things that are guaranteed, but which have simply not yet happened. It's the reality that is to come.

Since that's the case, we don't persevere because we "hope" God might work things out for our good one day in the future (if we're lucky). We persevere because He has made a promise and because His promises cannot be broken. If God has sacrificed His Son on a cross and has given to us His Spirit as a pledge of future glory, then the future glory is a concrete reality. The only difference between God's past miracles and His future promises is timing, not truth. One is just as real as the other. The word of a gentlemen is his honor. The Word of our God is the word of the ultimate gentleman.

Have you thought of hope as working its way out in your life that way? It must. It can't be just an internal wish list, a dream that we entertain when we're feeling optimistic—not if it's biblical. The truth is that God has left us in this painful world for a time, but He has also given to us future certainties to anticipate with excitement. The future certainties are everlasting, while the pain is temporary. That fact should shape our reaction to every trial that we face.

The Bible urges us to persevere because God knows we will face trials and hardships in many areas of our lives. But God would not let us base our perseverance on an abstract optimism. God tells us to base our perseverance on the reality of His kingdom. In light of that kingdom, perseverance becomes a lot easier to sustain than we ever thought.
